

THE SEPTEMBER EDITORIAL

Beneath these clement rays of the September sun, the sky is soft but pale, and the earth is yellowing. In the forests, the leaves are the color of amber; The bird no longer sings on the edge of its nest.

The swallows have fled from the plowmen's roofs; The sickle has passed over the golden ear of wheat; The fluttering of wings is no longer heard in the air: the blackbird whistles alone deep in the troubled woods.

The moss is without perfume, the grasses without softness; the rushes over the ponds bend anxiously; the sun, which is fading, fills the plain, the mountains, and the skies in the distance with a warm sadness.

The days are getting shorter; the water running in the valley no longer has those joyful sounds which delighted the air: it seems that the earth, both chilly and veiled, in its first shivers feels the arrival of winter.

d'Auguste Lacaussade*
